

Buried Treasure Handouts

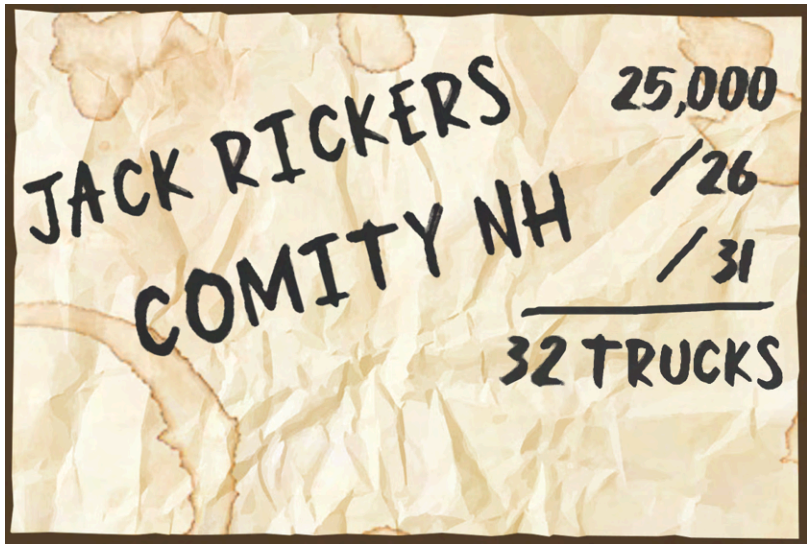

This file is provided as an alternative to the Buried_Treasure_Handout_Files.zip. It is intended to collect various maps, evidence, and character bios into one print-ready location.

Some of our devs favor this arrangement for the following use-cases:

- For in-person games, GMs can print out pages and hand them out as necessary.
- For online games some of this content is less convenient than the Handout_Files.zip, but some GMs may want to provide the character bios to their players. These pages represent the information players can learn about each NPC by examining their social media and online presence.
 - For online play you could screenshot a section and share it as an image, export/'print' specific pages as new PDFs so you can share them individually, or just copy out the text and paste it into a virtual tabletop or chat window.

To: Jack Rickers <boss@rickerssandandgravel.biz>

Dear Mr. Rickers,

This is Officer Shaw with the Comity Police Department. I'm trying to follow up on the arrest of Kevin and Markus Conway on your property at 89 Eldridge road on October 18th. The Department of Homeland Security has not processed any charges at this time and Agent Dixon hasn't returned our calls. Unless I hear back from his office we won't be able to hold the Conways after tomorrow evening. Considering the nature of the charges in question, reaching Agent Dixon is a priority. My understanding is that you work with him; if you know another way to reach him, please let me know.

If you want to press charges for trespassing or for any damages, please call me so I can take your statement about what happened up there.

Thank you,

Officer Edward Shaw

Maps of Comity

Players' map of Comity gains markers and points of interest as the story progresses. Below are a set of maps with various items included. If you need a map that includes and withholds waypoints not depicted below the game files contain a larger assortment of maps and editable files.

Map 2 - Worksites: This map includes reclaimer worksites, but not residential sites

Map 3 - Local Homesteads and Villages: This map includes homesteads, villages, and the locomodo camp, but not the deconstruction or rewilding worksites.

Map 4 - Points of interest: This map includes the worksites and residential sites

Map 5 - Suspected sites: parcels of land once owned by Jack Rickers

Map of Comity's Hydrology

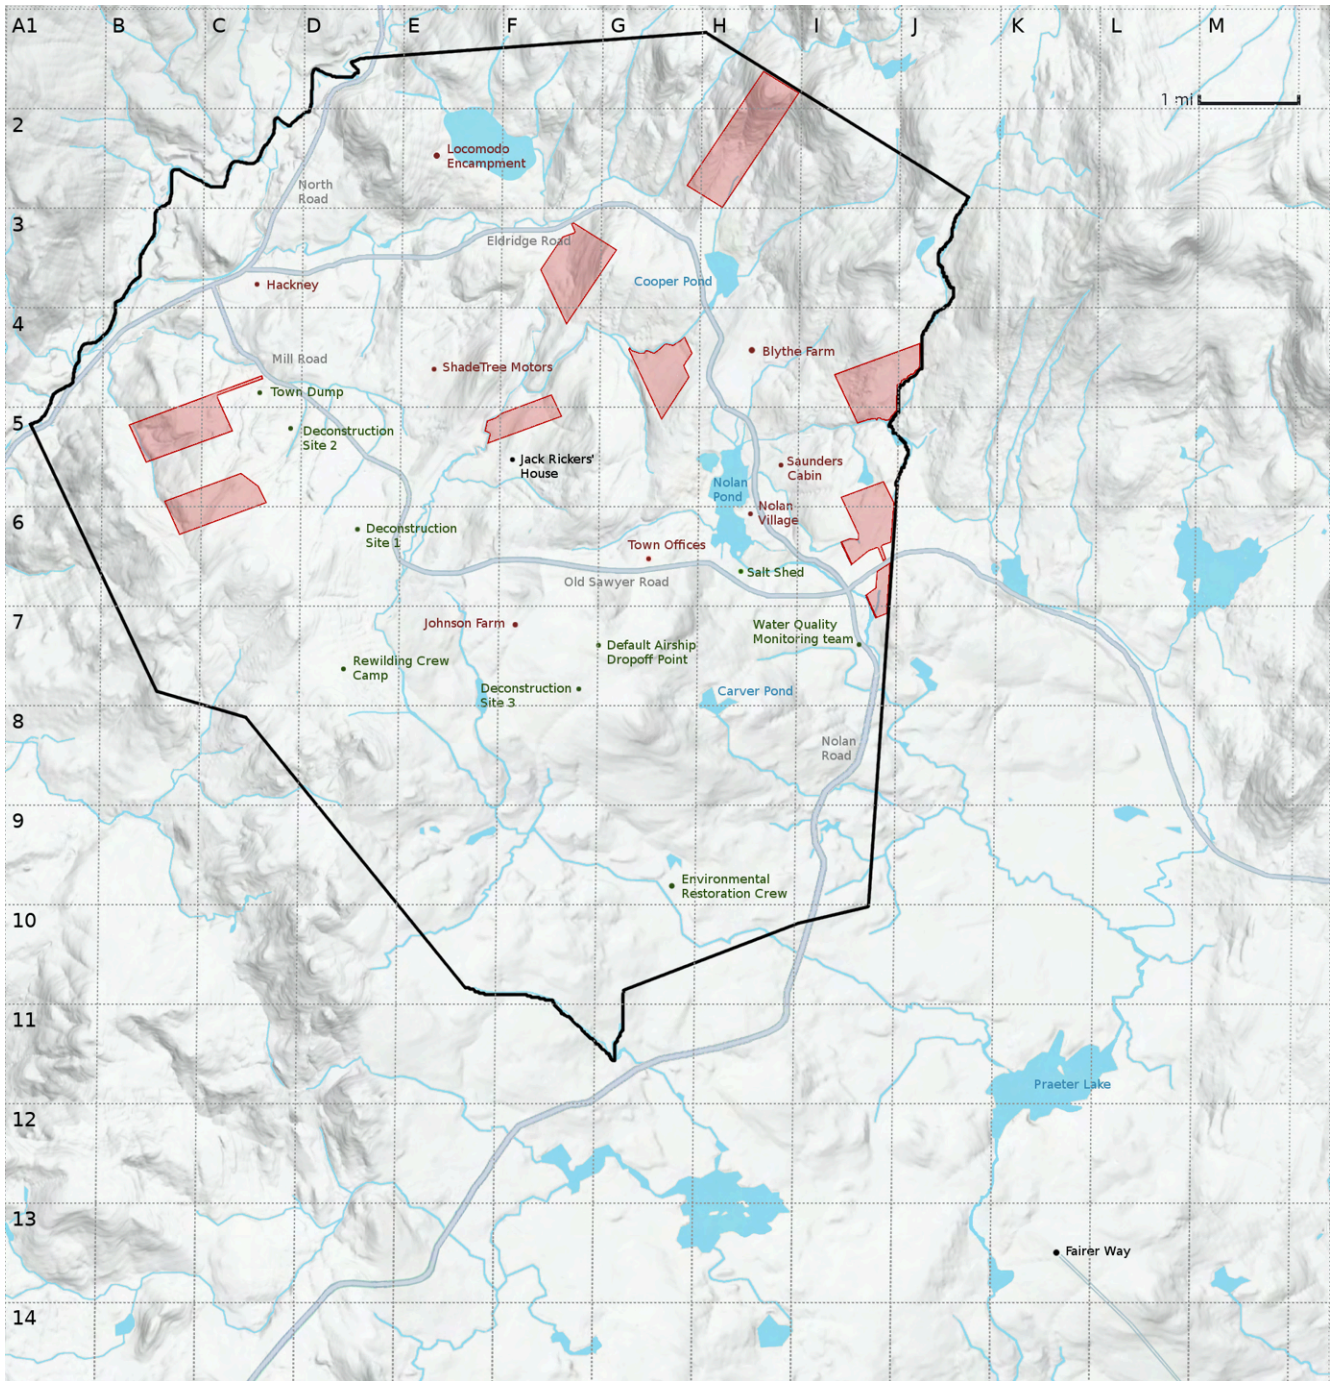

This is a map of Comity's groundwater movement. It's mostly pieced together from old data, including from test wells from hydrological studies done in different spots over the years, with a bit of simulation based on topology and known geology. The red lines indicate the boundaries of surface watersheds – ridges between valleys, essentially. Most of the groundwater flow matches what you'd expect from the surface, but if you're worried your contaminant might cross from one watershed to another underground, this might help you spot where that'd happen.

Characters

The character bios below are intended for sharing with players, either by printed hardcopy or digitally. For this reason, they’ve been modified from the version in the appendix of the game module to remove information meant for GMs such as secret roles in the story. They have been further tailored to serve as a summary of what players could find out about each NPC from their online presence.

Morgan Kemp, P.I. – Investigator

Names:	M.E. Kemp, PI; Morgan Elias Kemp (Given)

Species:	Human
Gender:	Enby (They/Them)
Followers:	2334 - Quasi-Private
Sapience:	S5
Education	University of Delaware, 2116 BS in Records Reconstruction

Morgan is an investigator working for a cooperative called Furnace Osmia, searching old world records to help find previously-unknown sources of industrial waste. They have been digging into the sparse records of a sketchy company called Deyesso Industrial Disposal, which was active in the United States before and during the Global Climate War, and they’ve tracked shipments of waste to somewhere in Comity, NH. They have asked the players to find the exact location of the waste.

There's not much information about Neal Dixon online. He has some social media but it's pretty locked down. The bits you can see, from his group memberships to his occasional public reaction to some news event, paint a picture of an angry old man and proud (if inactive) counterrevolutionary. It looks like he's retired in Florida somewhere.

It's clear from his own posts that he worked for the government in his youth, and old archived FISA and CopWatch sites clarify he was with the Department of Homeland Security. They have a few of his messages retrieved from after the department was forcibly disbanded, though anything you can find is remarkably benign. Some of his signatures show he was using the title of Industrial Security Liaison, though it doesn't say who to.

Jonas' online presence is somewhat fragmentary, he's been on many types of social media, including old corporate stuff, but much of it is gone now and it looks like he's recently switched to the local Fairer Way instances. From what you can put together, he worked in construction and manual labor until his 30s, then pivoted into library sciences after the war. He was very active in photography groups and events. The pictures mostly stop around the time he joined the Reclaimers and moved into Fairer Way, almost a year after the project began.

Leroy joined the Reclaimers while attending Potomac Watershed College for library science. That was where he heard that the Fairer Way project was supporting a local deconstruction effort and was struggling to organize the pre- and post-war paper records salvaged from the area into something useful. Seeing it as a suitable opportunity to get some experience and to put some of his knowledge into practice, he joined up and traveled north. He was a big part of bringing in the off-the-shelf archival software that the Reclaimers ended up using to store digital copies of all their records.

Digging deeper, looking through archives of older content and news articles, you realize that Jonas grew up in Comity (an article about the winners of a state fair photography contest mentions 12 YO Jonas Webb and includes the words 'of Comity, NH').

You also find more detailed employment history in old corporate social media: during and after high school he worked for North Woods Sand and Gravel, and eventually became a site supervisor. He then moved away from Comity and took gig work in Worcester until the end of the war when he joined the climate corp. During the '70s he went back to school and then moved into archival work.

It looks like his photography hobby dropped off because he's been busy with local work on three related projects - he's the lead archivist for the deconstruction work in Comity, but he's also received commendations for his work as a volunteer for the county Records Restoration Effort and the Watershed Management Board Rewilding Committee where he seems to be helping with both surveying and documentation.

Hester is very active on Reclaimer instances of social media. Most of her content involves bicycles and local events with friends. It looks like she appreciated the recent population boom of makers and salvage takers; perhaps she was homesick for the cities she grew up in before joining this project. Some of her recent posts mention how the place feels much more alive, and how she appreciates the chaotic bustle, even if it means the trails in town are crowded now.

It's clear she always loved biking – she has some earlier posts and discussions about adapting to the local conditions. And you can tell she was a major force in building the village's trail network and linking it with the larger, less dense local one. She helped plan and build the bike co-op, ensured they had a steady stream of salvaged bikes and parts, and sometimes arranges various bike-building contests whenever things seem too quiet.

Skimming through Randal's online presence, you quickly realize that despite his casual role in the food forest and dining hall, he was actually a major player in getting the entire Fairer Way project going. Looking through various articles, committee appointments, and his own posts, you can see he helped select the site, plan the development's conversion into a self-sufficient agricultural community, and that he worked with the local communities and the town and state governments to make sure the Reclaimers could take stewardship of the abandoned neighborhood to start their village.

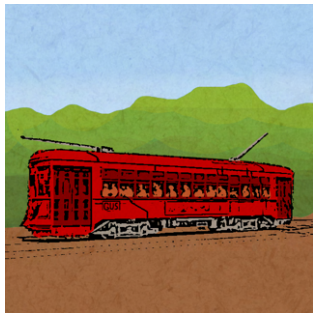

It was just starting to shape up into what they'd envisioned when the larger rewilding effort was announced, turning Fairer Way into a salvage-rush boomtown supporting the large deconstruction effort in Comity.

Shortly thereafter, Randal stepped back from major responsibilities to let those with a vision for navigating the rapid growth and inevitable bust take the lead. There were younger folks excited to tackle those challenges, with plans for how to manage their community and to gracefully shrink back to their intended purpose when the flood of salvage ended and the workers moved on to the next site.

He's made it clear that his real passion is tending the Food Forest and cooking for others, and he's happy to be able to do that full time these days. The Food Forest team credits him with a lot of the planning and work behind some of their recent successes, like oranges and coffee.

He splits his time between tending the gardens in the day and cooking at the community cafeteria in The Club for breakfast and dinner. He's an active and enthusiastic member of the community, and he loves meeting newcomers and watching their appreciation of the food he's worked so hard on.

Gus posts to a local microblog instance whenever it approaches or leaves a stop, and journals there about neat stuff it sees along its route. It seems very concerned with rider safety. Apparently it frequently stops to take pictures of animals.

Gus clearly enjoys the affection and gratitude of its community, and a certain amount of latitude in how it goes about its duties, thanks to the intentionally-leisurely pace of life in the village. Its feed is full of comments by Reclaimers and salvage takers adding encouragement and thanks for its work.

Collin is the bartender at Lonely Kevin's Basement Bar. It looks like his parents are also Reclaimers (part of a chapter in New Jersey) and he grew up helping with their projects, raised by that extended group. He really likes the usual Reclaimer work of turning parking garages, strip malls, and parking lots into vibrant communities. But you might suspect from his side gigs and library of simulation and fantasy games themed around taverns and inns, that he always dreamed of running a bar.

As a trained building inspector and roofer he was part of the first wave of Reclaimers who moved to the backwoods of New Hampshire, to an ambitious project to prove that they could repurpose some of the cheapest, worst-designed monuments to American capitalism ever slapped together. He helped inspect the abandoned McMansions, posting frequently about the baffling designs and terrible workmanship he found there.

He was delighted to find an intact basement bar just waiting for a community to finally use it, and again by the unexpected, rapid growth of the village from a planned commune into a boom town with enough people that real specializations could emerge. He lost no time establishing Lonely Kevin's as a proper bar.

Corey doesn't have a lot of presence online. It looks like he actually joined the Reclaimers fairly recently, and works at the receiving warehouse, where he's taken on the difficult job of cataloging, sorting, storing, and transporting the portion of the salvaged stuff which ends up in Fairer Way. There are some posts about it on the town's infopage. He started out in the deconstruction effort as an inspector and site coordination manager, but stayed in Fairer Way for a while after he fell through a rotten floor and injured his knee.

It looks like he helped with inspections after the Reclaimers voted to turn the remaining derelict McMansions into factories, workshops, artists' studios, and supplemental housing for the salvage takers, rather than deconstructing them as planned.

Then he proposed and established a sort of post office, the Receiving Warehouse, on the north edge of town to deal with the logistics nightmare around storing and transferring goods from the deconstruction and salvage crews to the new fixers, makers, and artists.

These days, he coordinates between the work crews and local industry, trying to get the supplies that makers and artists have requested and to find homes for whatever is actually found and brought.

His wife also lives in Fairer Way and works with two different book restoration co-ops.

From what you can see, Bob has lived in Comity his whole life. He seems well-connected to all the other locals, he's been a selectman and has helped on various town committees, and there are photos of him on work parties maintaining the trails the town uses in place of conventional roads. He seems to be on good terms with the work crews and Reclaimers, and is friends with them on various platforms.

He's the kind of guy who keeps an ear to the ground and knows all the local drama without participating in it much.

From a few public discussions and open comments it seems like he's not a huge fan of the decision to dissolve Comity as a town, but he's more interested in keeping it the same than in seeing it somehow recover into the busy, sprawling community it never was in his lifetime, so he's not against it either.

Hank's public social media usage has mostly died off in recent years, but he accumulated enough online presence in his younger days that you can still find out a bit about him. He's a lifelong Comity local in his nineties, he lost one leg from the knee down during the war but from an unrelated car accident. He has multiple prosthetics he uses for different tasks, though he's been using a mobility frame more often these days. From photos of him helping with trail maintenance and assorted projects around Nolan Village, he appears to still be quite physically active.

He's moved into the communal homestead in Nolan Village because he feels he's too old to live alone, but that apparently hasn't curtailed his various handyman and landscaping activities. And one of his last posts appears to be a short video where he absolutely trounces an entire opposing team in an old shooter videogame, so apparently he's still pretty sharp mentally too.

Any search for Grant online comes back with plenty of content on his various car projects, though not much on Grant himself. From his older content you can see he spent years on various restoration and vehicle hacking projects, car shows, and races, and built a decent following doing it. It looks like he built an elaborate racecourse in the woods around his home. From the recent stuff you can see that he now leads an enclave of fuel-engine mechanics who have settled on his family land, around what was once Comity's only remaining mechanic's garage. It seems he invited a decent number of friends from the retro-car scene to come live in the mostly-abandoned, parts-rich town.

It's hard to get a sense of scale but from the drone shots, the scattered collection of houses, machine shops, warehouses, and racetracks, is probably big enough to qualify as a village in its own right, though it's apparently not usually open to the public.

Both Grant and the ShadeTree crew have maintained a small online following for their scavenging, restoration work, and vehicle-hacking (building crazy custom vehicles out of the region's abundant parts). They also farm prodigious amounts of sugar beets to distill into fuel, and produce rum and moonshine on the side.

Outside of their own content, there's less to go on but even from the sparse online activity you can tell Grant is not particularly popular in town. He's the leader of a group responsible for a lot of noise, day and night, and it seems like he's very transactional in his dealings with others. But people here have more room to spread out than in our time, and have learned to rely on and look out for their neighbors in harder times, so he's probably better off than he might have been. Generally he's got his interests, and he's going to pursue them, and he has less concern for the impacts of his actions on people and animals around him than the average person in the world of FA!

It looks like his neighbors are willing to work with him when their priorities align - ShadeTree operates a full-scale firetruck and several offroad variants and are part of the volunteer firefighter network, and Grant himself is a major force in maintaining local trails and in keeping them navigable in the winter - and try not to interact when they don't.

Annmarie is quite well known - she authored a popular series of science fiction novels in the 2050s, which some of you may recognize. She transitioned into increasingly revolutionary writing in the 2060s, agitated for parahuman rights, and was an active voice in shaping the Realignment.

She has lived in Hackney since she was a child, back when most people barely bothered to use the old village name anymore. She is almost a hundred years old now and lives with her children and grandchildren in a homestead just a few hundred feet from her childhood home.

She was here during the war, raising the kids and writing while her wife fought overseas. Before she had kids, she traveled in the wider world sporadically for book tours, and once her kids were grown, she travelled to help set up communes and autonomous zones in other locations. But she has never known a home other than Comity.

Dr. Blythe is prominent in any local directories, infopages, or other resources about the region because she's the only doctor for miles. Her own social media and a smattering of articles document her life pretty well.

She's a kindly older lady living with her husband, kids, and grandkids in a homestead farm Northeast of Nolan Village, off Eldridge Road. She has lived in Comity in the same house for most of her life. After college she became a science and technology teacher at the local high school she attended. She met John, a free-spirited tradesman who'd come during the commune boom in '71, and they married in '75.

In 2089, the high school closed as enrollment plummeted, so Marcy pursued a new calling suited to the town Comity was becoming rather than the one it used to be. She went to med school and returned to practice medicine in 2095.

In 2103, Marcy and John took in eleven year-old Gail Hsiao after her single father died in a climbing accident. Gail left for college, but returned in 2115 with her husband and children in order to let them grow up around Marcy and John and experience a rural upbringing in Comity.

Marcy runs a basic medical practice out of her home, and, when necessary, makes house calls around town. In her downtime, she also draws on her old tech and networking background and helps maintain the mesh network which links what remains of her community to the outside world. The improved communications have allowed several injured people to contact her over the years and allowed her to call for outside medevac.

John is a soft-spoken older man living with his wife, kids, and grandkids in a homestead farm Northeast of Nolan Village, off Eldridge Road. His lived experience is described in part by his relatively private social media and articles about Marcy.

John grew up in North Carolina, where he picked up various trades, including carpentry, plumbing, electrical work, roofing, drywalling, painting and tile work. He moved all over the east coast and eventually ended up in New Hampshire in the commune boom of '71, where he met Marcy Blythe. They married in '75.

He found work as a carpenter and handyman throughout the region. When the school closed in '89 and Marcy went back to school to get a degree in medicine, John started making improvements to their homestead with the intent that they'd be able to get by, at least for a while, without an outside income. He continued his handyman work, though with the restored train lines rearranging the region and many commuters moving closer to the major stops, there was less of it to be found around Comity.

Due to a scarcity of doctors in the region, Marcy was able to fast-track her residency, and the two of them set up a small clinic in an addition to their home, north of Nolan Village.

In 2103, when Gail Hsiao was orphaned, he was 61, at which time he turned his attention to full-time parenting. Twenty years later, he spends his days looking after his grandkids, puttering in his workshop, and serving as Marcy's medical assistant when necessary.

Doug is an Arboreal Sciences professor with the University of New Hampshire's Cooperative Extension program. His lectures are available online and he documents his work extensively in both a personal blog and open source academic papers. He's been coming to Comity and the surrounding towns for years as part of a long-term rewilding program rehabilitating sites damaged by extractive industries. His first trip out was over a decade ago, as an undergrad, and he fell in love with the month-long fieldwork excursions. He returned several times as a grad student, freelance arborist, and later professor. This is his second time leading the expedition.

In his normal life, he spends most of his working hours in the university greenhouses and tree farms, teaching labs and overseeing the development of several invasive-species resistant cultivars of native trees. His work has helped to reintroduce tree species which were devastated by the Emerald Ash Borer and Pine Bast Scale, and he's apparently garnered a bit of a reputation for his special obsession with ending the threat of the Hemlock Woolly Adelgid.

From reading through his posts, memberships, and boosted content, it's pretty clear that fixing damaged environments was a childhood dream for Logan and that he's a proud, almost fanatical participant in the Thousand Year Cleanup. He may go further than most to help people who are working to undo the damage caused by the Old World.

He studied ecology, environmental science, soil science, and eventually started working with an environmental restoration co-op. Over the last decade he's helped clean up former factories and industrial zones, dumping sites, junkyards, gun ranges, dry cleaners, and old wildfire sites where the chemical suppressants had turned out to be poisonous.

He's currently leading the hastily-assembled cleanup effort of the old Comity Town Dump. From here, it looks like a coalition of the local watershed management board and the remnants of the county and town governments have pooled their resources to get the site remediated before the rewilding effort makes it even harder to reach. (You get the sense that they might have been procrastinating on this one and recently realized it's now or never.) The site was a mess with very little recorded history to work from, and they keep finding new buried waste pits, so Logan has plenty to keep him busy.

Debora started out working for the North East Housing Collaborative towards its broad mission of ensuring there is enough housing available for everyone in the region and improving the quality of existing housing through free repairs, assistance bringing ad-hoc domiciles up to code, and new construction. Her role in these community efforts probably explains why her online presence is so open.

Debora learned carpentry through her early volunteering and took on more and more coordination and organizational work as she gained experience. Eventually she found herself organizing projects across multiple layers of government, co-ops, mutual-aid networks, charities, and volunteer orgs; getting buy-in from communities; and sourcing materials. She was 35, deeply buried in paperwork and organizational drama, and needed to start fresh, so she resigned her role and joined a deconstruction co-op out of Maine.

Her skills for coordination and problem solving resurfaced within a few years, however – she was too good at fixing things to not help when she saw an issue underway. For her efforts, she soon found herself managing a crew, and eventually an entire worksite. She didn't mind the responsibility, but she made it very clear that if they tried to promote her any further from the real work, she'd start over somewhere else.

Five years later, she's still running deconstruction sites, just the ones deeper into wilderness areas where the logistics get more difficult.

Helaney is part of a deconstruction and house shifting co-op operating in the New England region. For the last twenty years, she's been taking houses apart and putting them back together somewhere else, or else turning the materials over to new construction projects in the region. She's done a bit of every role in deconstruction in that time, and has recently put those skills together to build a solid foundation for her work as a site inspector and foreman.

It looks like her work in Comity started with finding buildings which were suitable for shifting elsewhere by airship and that that's her real passion. She's posted a lot of photos of houses being jacked up off their foundations, work crews wrapping them in steel support frames, and finally massive airships overhead hoisting each building up until they vanish into the hold. Lately that's stopped; it looks like her team ran out of suitable houses and joined the larger deconstruction effort.

She journals a lot about the work of shifting and deconstructing houses, and the little details and history she finds. During her inspections - as she checks for structural damage, shoddy workmanship, signs of animals or insects, and dangerous construction materials and practices from the old world - she also sees little bits of the lives lived in the place: the heights of children marked on a doorframe, a structural post scratched up by housecats, crayon drawings on a wall behind a couch... some places still have furniture and even old photographs and knickknacks.

She clearly feels a great deal of pride in saving these houses when she can, watching each one carried away to a new family. Helping people to find a place to live or work means a lot, but the preservation of those buildings - the years of history and memories and purpose - seems to be what really makes it all worthwhile for her.

Now she's working on the buildings they can't shift, the ones too damaged, too sprawling, the ones with the wrong foundation, and trying to salvage everything she can. Even buildings with serious problems hold a tremendous amount of usable materials, some of which aren't even made anymore. It might not be as satisfying, but it's important. And the history is preserved in every scuffed kitchen cabinet, every door, every countertop her crews carefully remove and send south by truck; skilled deconstruction helps ensure that they'll continue serving their purpose somewhere new.

Denali grew up in a construction family. Once he was old enough, he joined a construction co-op and came to specialize in retrofits of existing buildings. That work connected him to the deconstruction crews who prepped the structures his teams worked on, and he decided to join them and learn their side of the trade.

When the salvage boom kicked off and swept through abandoned towns in the region, Denali's new co-op followed the work all over New England, often backtracking wherever local communities decided to finally, formally, disassemble abandoned structures.

These days he's overseeing Deconstruction Site 3. His crew includes volunteers from Comity, including several from the Fox Mountain Locomodos, who sometimes provide additional management challenges.

Deacon Sitwa is a radio operator and electrician journeyman currently working at Deconstruction Site 3. His feed includes a jumbled mix of photos and videos of work on remote, overgrown jobsites and life in the temporary barracks the work crews set up in the abandoned houses and garages. As you scroll through you see pranks, running jokes, games, occasional hikes and kayak trips, and of course partying whenever they get into Fairer Way or other towns further south.

Reading through posts and text threads from just after he joined the deconstruction effort, it actually looks like Deacon played a significant role in establishing the protocols and communications network the work sites and Fairer Way Reclaimers currently use to keep all the groups connected, informed, and safe. It's odd to think the formalized communications system and the Reclaimers' elaborate radio setup at the Comms and Records building all started with a bunch of apprentice workers meeting up over beers.

Erin's social media appears to be a mix of airship interiors, flying crane and cargo handling memes, and carefully-currated galleries of tourism in various places the Legitimate has found work. There's a brief span when she had to leave the Legitimate so she could apprentice with outside teachers and obtain her pilot's certifications but otherwise she seems to have been with the airship her whole life.

In fact, it looks like she grew up on board. One of her mothers was a cargo handler, the other a technician working in the ship's envelope. The narrow corridors, access passages, gangplanks, and catwalks were her childhood playground and neighborhood, and the crew her extended family. Her home traveled constantly for their flying crane work, and she's seen much of the world. Though lately it looks like they've been staying near the North American east coast and she hasn't disembarked very much.

Galen appears to be the closest thing to a leader the Fox Mountain Locomodos have. Representative might be a better word. He also has more of a social media presence than most of the other locomodos, though he doesn't have much of a following. The content on his personal accounts seems to prioritize promotional stuff for the group over his own experiences. There are posts and photo galleries covering their remediation work, both elsewhere and in town, members' contributions to search and rescue efforts, even some videos of a sort of training game where some members of the group will hide somewhere in town and the rest practice their tracking skills and improve their familiarity with the territory by finding them.

His activity has slowed down recently; it's possible he set up these accounts while the group was applying for their current role, and he wanted to make a good impression with anyone who looked them up. Maybe he doesn't need to do that anymore now that the group is established, or maybe he's just too busy.

From what you can see, Galen grew up in Illinois with parents who were survivalists and environmentalists of a generation that remembered when the threats to living wild included federal law enforcement agencies. They were survivalist modificados of the first generation to get the treatments, and they raised Galen and his siblings on several communes in the midwest.

Like many of his generation of locomodos, he traveled seasonal migration circuits and made friends and connections, then settled down once he'd found a place and people he wanted to call home. For him, it was the Red Miini commune outside of Albany. Galen had two kids, and when they were old enough, he resumed his travels to learn, teach, plant, and harvest at other wildland communes.

Galen is around 45 years old and he seems to be treated as more of an elder by the Fox Mountain Locomodos than he actually is. He was elected to the role of Speaker (a mix of leader, mediator, sheriff, and ambassador).

From looking at her connections and relatives, it's clear that Kaylee is actually a member of the larger Reclaimers network; all of her parents were Reclaimers, and she grew up with the network for much of her extended family.

She got her first mods to join a Fae locomodo community, but drifted away from the performative roleplay aspects as she got older. She heard about the Fox Mountain splinter group while it was still negotiating for rewilding land, and she felt it could provide both the lifestyle she preferred and the sense of purpose she currently lacked. In a couple posts she describes it as a locomodo group that fits her Reclaimer drive to fix things.

It appears that she has found a niche as a go-between for the Fox Mountain Locomodos and the Fairer Way Reclaimers, often working to quench minor conflicts before they can escalate. Kaylee is known to most as Míntířigh (pronounced min-TEE-rig) or Mint, from the Gaelic word for "reclaim."

Cat’s only online presence appears to be a bio on the Fox Mountain Locomodo infopage. She is listed as a liaison to the long-term Comity residents – the holdouts who will remain as stewards of their own little islands of land, and mutual caretakers of everything in between, for the rest of their lives.

Veronica Gentry (Sister, 19)

Jae had a fairly active online presence that tapered off once they moved to Comity. They've been a locomodo for almost two years, having received the mods on their 18th birthday. You can tell they're deeply into the locomodo identity, and though they might have preferred a more howl-with-the-wolves identity group, the conservation-oriented Fox Mountain group still has plenty of strong opinions on how humanity should adapt to live light on the Earth, and Jae has absorbed that stuff pretty thoroughly.

Prior to the move, they spent a lot of time writing about their plans, the wilderness they'd find, the cleanup projects they'd take on. It looks like they weren't around for the drama when the State and Watershed Management Board's censuses found more local holdouts than anticipated and granted them perpetual 'grandfathered' land stewardships. Nonetheless, from their early posts once they got to the area, they were dismayed at the state of the land, the number of sites needing remediation, and the number of 'outsiders' currently occupying their new territory.

Their recent posts are sparse, perhaps because they've embraced the low tech locomodo lifestyle, or just because connectivity is spotty even on the meshnet. You can see they've got a group of friends here, and that the four of them are currently volunteering part time with one of the deconstruction crews.

The first thing you notice while reviewing Octavia’s online presence is that she’s part of a vocal minority that feels that even the post-scarcity society of Fully Automated isn’t doing enough. She clearly feels its environmental progress globally is slow and weak, placing too much priority on luxury and leisure while lacking the commitment to make real improvement on humanity’s debt.

From her social media, (and overlap with Jae Gentry’s more public profiles), you can piece together a bit of a background. It looks like she grew up in survivalist communes in the Cayuga Lake wildlands. She attended the same boarding school in Ithaca as Jae Gentry. It looks like she was the one who found the barely-established Fox Mountain Locomodos through environmentalist boards and introduced Jae to them, and she’s a true believer in their goals of living as lightly as possible and restoring the earth. Similar to the Reclaimers who took on Fairer Way to prove it can be done, she sees adopting the Locomodo lifestyle and restoring this land as a sort of ambassadorship.

She is fiercely protective of the progress they’ve made and the habitats they’ve restored, and you can see she’s come to love this area very much.

Nickolas grew up in Buffalo, New York. His mother was a fae dryad and his father a mostly-unmodded medieval larper and games lawyer. Nickolas grew up in a blended co-parenting house of three families with several parents and older peers who were survival-modified to various degrees. Nickolas started getting his first mods when he was fourteen.

Most of his recent posts were around adapting to his current set of mods, which are extensive and include, among other things, bat-style infrared sensing and most of the 'full wolfman' (featuring permanent fur which sheds to a lighter coat in the summer, enhanced night vision, enhanced sense of smell, and the ability to eat raw meat, though he skipped any obligate carnivore mods).

His social activity is sparse but it looks like he met Jae and Octavia in 2121 after moving to Ithaca and decided to join them when they joined the Fox Mountain Locomodos.

Most of your current info about him comes from the Fox Mountain infopage and Galen Acosta's social media, as Nickolas features in several posts about wilderness survival and the group's search and rescue preparations. It looks like Nickolas has thrown himself into wilderness training, learning bushcraft from older members of the group, and has thrived in the Fox Mountain Locomodos' tracking training games.

The group routinely does survivalist-adjacent exercises, including days-long 'foxhunt' games where a group of 'prey' locos leave early and attempt to hide their trail and evade detection while others search for them. These competitions help improve group cohesion, but they also train the Fox Mountain Locomodos for one of their stewardship responsibilities - finding missing people in their territory. Nickolas is widely-regarded as damn-near impossible to track.

Lemyue’s internet presence is basically nonexistent; any social media is quite locked down. Some archives yield up a little information which had been removed elsewhere. It looks like she grew up in a well-established neoprimitivist commune in the former states of Montana and Wyoming. If the name you’ve got and the bits of detail you’ve found are accurate, it’s possible she’s somehow related to a large family known for founding communes and organizing the disparate neoprimitivist groups into mutual aid networks during the Crumbles leading to the American Realignment. They’re kind of a big deal out there - hundreds of people credit them with their survival and they continue to hold leadership roles.

It’s certainly not a guarantee, but that might be the kind of legacy you’d want to escape if you were the type to want to blaze your own path.

Isabelle is one of few Fox Mountain Locomodo with a real online presence. In fact, it looks like she only went locomodo recently. Until a few years ago she was working towards a masters degree in phytoremediation and leading experiments with genmod poplar trees. From the pictures it looks like the work required her to spend a lot of time in the field, inspecting her trees and the contaminated sites, and she made friends with the locomodos who volunteered on that project.

She started staying with their pack in her downtime; there are a bunch of photos of them all camping, hiking, and just hanging out outdoors. Shortly thereafter she obtained several survival modifications of her own, and joined her friends' pack. There are some photos from their welcome ceremony. Apparently the larger pack splintered due to a number of internal disagreements less than a year later and she went looking for a similar group.

From the Fox Mountain infopage, she seems to have been involved early in their application for stewardship of Comity and the surrounding land. She joined the early visits and was one of the first to move to town and start exploring before the agreement with the watershed management board, county, and town was finalized.

Their (admittedly outdated) infopage lists her as working to finish the remediation of the former Comity Town Dump.

Vic's online presence is minimal and locked down. But even what little you can find makes it clear that he went locomodo to escape a society he feels still demands too much of a damaged world. He feels that human environmental progress globally is slow and weak, placing too much priority on luxury and leisure while lacking the commitment to make real improvement on humanity's debt.
